AROUND THE TOWN

Their is some talk of forming a baseball league in six or eight of the towns throughout this section of Alberta for this season.

Mr. O. Hallman and wife, who have just returned from points in Ontario, report a very mild winter in that locality and a very enjoyable time.

Rev. Jacob B. Detwiler was married to Miss Marguerite A. Williams of 281 Langaide street Winnipeg, Man., on Feb. 28th. The ceremony took place at the residence of Rev. T. E. Taylor of Glenboro, Man., whose wife is a sister of the bride.

W. Geddes returned from Prince Rupert last week and reports a fine trip. He states that Prince Rupert is humming with activity, both the railroad and the city pushing immense undertakings in improvements, although business in the retail line seemed to be quiet.

A meeting will be called for Friday evening, March 10, at 8 o'clock, at the Golden West sample rooms to organize a baseball club for the coming season. It will be discussed at this meeting whether Didsbury will have a football or baseball team this year. Everybody come to this meeting.

Engage New Policeman

The Council met in regular session on Monday night in the Council chamber. Mayor Atkins, Councilors Shantz, St. Clair, Moyer, Oliver, Wrigglesworth, Morrison and Clerk Reed.

Application for the position of policeman were first taken up. There were two applications sent in, one from Mr. J. Kuly for a salary of $70 per month and the other from Mr. A. P. Enevoldson for $50.

Shantz-Wrigglesworth—That this Council engage Mr. Enevoldson as policeman for the town of Didsbury at the salary mentioned in his tender. Carried.

St. Clair Shantz—That a part of the police duties shall be that of pound keeper. Carried.

Morrison-Moyer—That policemen's hours be from 8 o'clock a. m. till noon, then from 1.30 p. m. to 5 p. m. and from 7.30 p. m. to 11 p. m. also to be subject to any emergency call at any time.—Carried.

The Council then adjourned. A special meeting is to be held on Monday night next, to consider the early closing bylaw and the electric light proposition. The Council received estimates from expert Maxwell of Camrose but had no time to consider them.

An argument regarding taxation of beef rings doing business in town in opposition to our local butchers took up considerable time of Council. A resolution was brought in by Couns. St. Clair and Wrigglesworth covering this question and favoring taxation but no action was taken on it. The local butchers feel that they are not getting fair treatment by the town or the public in this matter and are objecting to paying any taxes on their business when these beef rings are at full liberty to peddle their goods.

Will Spend Taxes on Salaries

The Council seem determined to spend all the taxes this year on salaries. First the scavenger's salary was raised $150 a year and now they have gone to work and employed a constable at a salary of $600 a year, an increase of $300 over last year, or so far a total increase of $450 for these two positions alone, which would go a considerable way in much needed improvements for the town. Of course the constable is to give his whole time to police duties, but nothing is specified as to his assisting in public works when there is nothing doing in these duties. Former Councils tried this same method and found that it did not pay and they employed the constable in every way possible. The system in force last year was fairly good with the exception of a short period when there was trouble with one of the hotels, but this has been remedied to a great extent by a change of ownership and it is doubtful if there is a town on the C. & E. that is better in this respect than is Didsbury at the present time and so the need of a constable all the time is greatly lessened to what it was and we cannot see any other reason for this big extra expenditure.

Another matter brought up at the Council meeting was the taxation of beet rings, but nothing was done to assist those who are in the retail butcher business to make a living out of it and who have to pay a heavy tax for doing this business and who are contented by by-laws governing the conduct of their business. It is an injustice to a few to allow others who do not pay a cent for the upkeep of the town to step in when it suits them to do so and the other man has to pay his taxes and to keep his stock up not only when the beef ring is running but also to accommodate the patrons of the beef ring when said ring is out of business for any reason a few months of the year. This matter should have been pushed harder a few years ago when the rings were first started, but in justice to the under dog it is "never too late to mend." Practically all other businesses are protected but the butcher and the printer, and they it seems have to pay their taxes in spite of outside competition. An instance which is well known took place a short time ago when certain parties started a business in town who had to pay a heavy license to do so and one of the Councilors who is upholding the beef ring was one of the first to get after these parties. Justice is all that is wanted.

THE FOUR FINGERS

By FRED M. WHITE,

Author of

The Grimsm Blind; The Cardinal Moth; The Weight of the Crown; The Corner House; The Slave of Silence; Craven Fortune; The Fatal Dose; Netta.

"I should think about five minutes more would be it," one of them said. "Better carry him out, and shove him in that little sentry box of his. When he comes to himself again he won't know but what he has fallen asleep; barring a headache, the little beggar won't be any the worse for the adventure."

"Have we got all the stuff up now?" the other man asked.

"Every bit of it," was the whispered reply.

"I hope the old man is satisfied now. It was not a bad idea or his to work his little game in a big hotel of this kind. But all the same, it is not without risks, and I for one should be glad to get away to that place in the country where we are going in a week or two."

Gurdon heard no more. He allowed the heat part of the matter to creep through the ventilator and reach the hands in the neighbourhood of the lift. Everything looked quite normal now, and as if nothing had happened. The lift boy said it was in the lift, yawning and stretching himself. It was quite evident that he knew nothing of the vile scheme he had been part of. A sudden idea occurred to Gurdon.

"I want you to bring the lift up to this floor," he said to the boy.

"No, I don't want to use it; I have lost something, and it occurs to me that I might have left it in the lift."

In the usual unconcerned manner of his class the boy touched an electric button, and the lift slowly rose from the basement.

"Does this go right down to the cellar?" Gurdon asked.

"It can if it's wanted to," the boy replied. "Only it's very seldom does. You see, we only use the lift for our customers. It's fitted with what they call a magnetic cushion—I mean, if anything goes wrong, the lift goes into a funnel shaped web, made of concrete, which forms a cushion of air, and so breaks the fall. The boy said you could cut the rope and let it down without so much as upsetting a glass of wine. Not that I should like to try it, sir, but there you are."

Gurdon entered the lift, where he pretended to be searching for something, for a moment or two. In reality, he was scraping up some of the yellow sand which had fallen from the box onto the floor of the lift, and this he proceeded to place in a scrap paper. Then he decided that it was absolutely necessary to retire to his room, though he was still in full possession of his waking faculties. As a matter of fact, he was asleep almost as soon as his head touched the pillow. Nevertheless, he was up early the following morning, and in Verner's bedroom long before breakfast. He had an exciting story to tell, and he could not complain that in Verner he had anything but an interested listener.

"We are getting on," the latter said grinning. "But I fear you say anything more, I should like to have a look at that yellow sand you speak of. Bring it over near the light."

Verner let the yellow stuff trickle through his hands; then he turned to Gurdon with a smile.

"You look upon this as refuse, I suppose?" he said. "You seem to imagine that it is of no great value."

"Well, is it?" Gurdon asked. "What is it?"

"Gold," Verner said curtly. "Pure virgin gold, of the very finest quality. I never saw a better sample."

CHAPTER V. A Puzzle For Verner.

Verner sat just for a moment or two with the thin stream trickling through his fingers, and wondering what it all meant. With his superior knowledge of past events, he could see in this thing something that it was impossible for Gurdon to follow.

"I suppose this is some of the gold from the Four Finger Mine?" Gurdon suggested. "Do you know, I have never handled any virgin gold before. I had an idea that it was more brilliant and glittering. Is this very good stuff?"

"Absolutely pure, I should say," Verner replied. "There are two ways of gold mining. One is by crushing quartz in machinery, as they do in South Africa, and the other is by obtaining the metal in what are called pockets or placers. This is the way in which it is generally found in Australia and Mexico. I should not be in the least surprised if this came from the Four Finger Mine."

"There is no reason why it should not," Gurdon said. "It is pretty evident from what you told me last night, that Mark Fenwick has discovered the mysterious treasure house, but that does not account for all these proceedings. Why should he have taken all the trouble he did last night, when he might just as well have brought the stuff in, and taken the boxes out by the front door?"

"That is what we have to find out," Verner said. "That fellow may be calling himself a millionaire, but I believe he is nothing more nor less than a desperate adventurer."

Gurdon nodded his assent. There must have been something very urgent to compel Mark Fenwick to adopt such methods. Why was he so strangely anxious to conceal the knowledge that he was receiving boxes of pure gold in the hotel, and that he was sending out something of equal value? However carefully the thing might have been planned, the dragging of lift attendants must have been attended with considerable risk. And the slightest accident would have brought about a revelation. As it was, everything seemed to have passed off smoothly, except for the chance by which Gurdon had stumbled on the mystery.

"We can't leave the thing here," the latter said. "For once in my life I am going to turn amateur detective. I have made up my mind to get into Fenwick's suite of rooms and see what is going on there. Of course, the thing will take time, and will have to be carefully planned. Do you think it is possible for us to make use of your wife in this matter?"

"I don't think so," Verner said thoughtfully. "In the first place, I don't much like the idea, and in the second, I am entirely at a loss to know what mysterious hold Mark Fenwick has on Vera. As I told you last night, she left me within a very short time after our marriage, and until a few hours ago I had never looked upon her again. Something terrible must have happened, or she would never have deserted me in the way she did. I don't for a moment believe that Mark Fenwick knew anything about our marriage, but on that point I cannot be absolutely certain. The day he came back to me later in the night, and I will see what I can do. It is just possible that good fortune may be on my side."

The afternoon was dragging on, and still Verner was no nearer to a practical scheme which would enable him to make an examination of Fenwick's rooms without the chance of discovery.

He was lounging in the hall, smoking innumerable cigarettes, when he just possibly came to a decision. Obviously the man was going on a journey, for he was closely muffled up in a fur coat, and behind him came a servant, carrying two bags and a railway rug. It was a large and heavy-looking fellow, and Verner was enabled to watch what was going on without being seen himself. He did not fail to note a certain strained anxiety that rested on Fenwick's face. The man looked behind him up and down the hall, and behind him being followed. Verner had seen that same fat man in the street, who was waiting for him, and he had seen him at the office and handed a couple of keys to the clerk. His instructions were quite audible to Verner.

"I shouldn't want those for a day or two," he said. "You will see that no one has these under my protection. Probably I shall be back by Saturday at the latest."

Verner did not scruple to follow Fenwick's disappearing figure as far as the street. He was anxious to obtain a clue to Fenwick's destination. Straining his ears, he just managed to catch the words "Charing Cross," and then returned to the hall, by no means dissatisfied. Obviously, Fenwick was intending to cross the channel for a day or two, and he himself had said that he would not be back before Saturday.

Here was something like a chance at last. Very slowly and thoughtfully Verner went up the stairs in the direction of his own room. He had ascertained by the time that one part of Fenwick's suite was immediately over his own bedroom. His idea now was to walk up to the next floor, and make a close examination of the rooms there. It did not take him long to discover the fact that Fenwick's suite was well contained, like a flat. That is to say, a strong outer door once locked made communication with the suite of rooms impossible. Verner was still pondering over his problem when the master door opened, and Vera came out so hurriedly as almost to fall into Verner's arms. She turned pale as she saw him; and as she closed the big door hurriedly behind her, Verner could see that she had in her hand the tiny Yale key which gave entrance to the suite of rooms. The girl looked distressed and embarrassed, but not much more so than Verner, who was feeling not a little guilty.

But all this was lost upon Vera; her own agitation and her own unhappiness seemed to have blinded her to everything else.

"What are you doing here?" she stammered.

"Perhaps I am looking for you," Verner said. He had quite recovered himself by this time. "I was in the lounge just now when I saw that sound, Fenwick, go out. He is not coming back for a day or two, I understand."

"No," Vera said with accents of evident relief. "He is gone, but I don't know where he is going. He never tells me."

Just for a moment Verner looked somewhat sternly at his companion. Here was an opportunity for an explanation, and he was to be lost.

"There is a little above at the end of the corridor," he said. "I see it is full of ferns and flowers. In fact the very place for a confidante. Whether you like it or not, I am going to have an explanation. Vera, the girl shrank back from her face. Yet, at the same time, the pleading imploring eyes which she turned upon her companion's face were filled with the deepest affection. Baffled as he had been treated, Verner could not

"Why should I?" Verner demanded. "I am my own master, I have more money than I know what to do with. I have practically no relations to consider. You were all-sufficient for me. I loved you for your own sake alone. I cared nothing, and I care nothing still for your past. What I want to know is, how long this is going to last?"
